

A HEARTLESS WOMAN.

Artist and poet—but, above all, dreamer, like every one of German extraction—he was just the man to be enthralled by the spirituality of her face and the exquisite refinement of her nature.

Without that smile she is an odd-looking and not a pretty girl; with its magic lighting her face she grows beautiful and angelic. No wonder it enthralled the dreamy artist-nature of Gustave Wittich and bound him to her heart and soul.

Is it for good or ill? Is she angel or demon?

"And to-morrow we must part, Georgia. Oh, my dearest! what shall I do when you are far away?"

"Why, you will make marvellous pictures and write beautiful poems, and become a great and famous artist, Gustave," she said, in low, soft tones, trying lightly with the golden curls of his hair.

"Ah! yes, I will work very hard; now I have an incentive. And it seems to me, darling, that I could do wondrous things with your love to treasure in my heart. I was dead, as it were, till I knew you; in all my life no love had gladdened my spirit; but you have inspired me, and all the love of my soul is given to you. The dreamy languor is gone, and I can now work with a will for your sweet sake; to earn a home for you, dear Georgia, is now my only wish. "Dear," he said, looking up into her face, "will you be true to me? Sometimes I fear that you may grow weary of the years of waiting—for it may be years, Georgia, ere I can make you my wife—and I fear, dear, that you may."

"Prove faithless? Why, Gustave, how you wrong me! How could I be untrue to one whom I love so devotedly? It is you whom I ought to doubt."

"No, no, Georgia! you know that never can! Every thought of my heart, every impulse of my nature, centres in you. Life would be utterly worthless and aimless if you were to cast me off. I should want to die. You hold my life in your hands, Georgia! Georgia!" he said, with sudden earnestness, "be true to me—be true to me!"

"You would me by your implied doubts. Do you not know that I love you—do you not trust me?" she asked.

"Yes, yes, I do; but my love for you is so intense, it is such a great happiness to be near you, and to know that you love me, that I fear I cannot last. To tell you all my own would be joy so great as falls not often to the lot of mortals. I tremble when I think how I love you, my beautiful, beautiful girl!"

"Hush!" she said, stooping over him, and lightly kissing his brow; "you make me vain, Gustave."

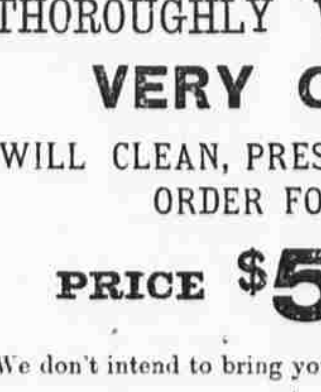

"Vain? That is a fault of ordinary women; my lady's face is a rarity, a diamond among pebbles," he said, looking into her face with all his soul in his eyes.

"You will go back to your home; you will have many admirers; but my dearest will be constant and true?"

"I will, indeed, Gustave: I will be true
